Attachment to Form PTO-1449

In the "Star Trek" television series, characters in the series wore a device on their shirts that was referred to as a "communicator". This communicator was operated by being pressed or otherwise touched; and, it is believed, purported to permit communication between characters in the series and to provide access to the computer of the "Enterprise" spaceship.

This communicator was a prop only and not an actual operating device. Applicant makes no representation that this communicator comprises prior art to the present invention; however, it is being brought to the attention of the Examiner pursuant to Applicant's duty of disclosure.

To the best of Applicant's knowledge, the "Star Trek" television show was first copyrighted in 1965 by Gene Roddenberry and the series was first aired in 1966.
